Various different classes of valves of this type, and in particular three-way or check valves, are generally known in the art. The known design variants of valves of this type allow a relative unimpeded flow in one direction and a largely unidirectional flow in the opposite direction. Valves of this type are used, for example, for an indirect injection system of a diesel engine. In this case, the fuel is injected into the combustion chamber via an injector by means of a fuel pump which is designed as a positive-displacement pump and delivers the fuel under a low pressure to the valve, as a result of which the unimpeded flow is carried out. In the opposite direction, the fuel flows out of the valve via the two inlet ports into the engine intake manifold in unidirectional form as a result of the pressure of the injection. In the known valves of this type, the valve housing has a cylindrical body for mounting the valve. The cylindrical body is provided with a base body in which a first and a second inlet port open. Also provided are a first and a second outlet port which open to the outer end face of the base body at the outer end sides of the first and second inlet ports. The first and second outlet ports each lead from the inner end face of the base body to the inner surface of the cylindrical body to the outside. This design, however, has disadvantages, particularly when the valves are used for jet pumps where high pressures can be required. In such a case, the known designs have a high thermal load due to the significant heat loss. In this case, a relatively high power is required to operate the valve with low thermal conductivity.Q: How to get a javascript object from an array-index with a string parameter? I have an array like so: var myArray = ["Homepage", "Page 3", "Page 4"]; I also have a get object which contains the string parameters I am searching for. var myObject = { "Homepage": "index.htm", "Page 3": "index3.htm", "Page 4": "index4.htm" }; When searching for the string in myArray, my current approach is: var myResult = myArray.filter(function(d){

Q: What is the difference between FitNesse and Selenium2Library? I want to use FitNesse to unit test my web pages. I think that FitNesse is more powerful than Selenium2Library. Is it true? Can anyone give me an example of these two tools? A: FitNesse and Selenium are related but different in many ways. FitNesse, also known as Page Objects, allows you to capture a required test case (e.g. a SQL or NoSQL database) and run it in a similar manner to a unit test within the context of a programming language. At its simplest, this will allow you to: Create a FitNesse.fit file to define the expectations of the test Create one or more pages (if necessary) in FitNesse to facilitate the running of tests Run the test by invoking a FitNesse command, e.g. fit test.fit Using FitNesse can be a great way to test your database-oriented SQL scripts, for example. The nice thing about FitNesse is that all of the expected test failures will be collected in the FitNesse.fit file and it can be rerun from scratch without the need to re-execute your scripts. The test files can also include the data required to run your test, which can make it easier to maintain. Selenium has long been used to run unit tests in the context of programming languages. Since then, the strength of FitNesse is that it allows you to easily test the requirements of a web page without having to simulate a web browser (it runs a web browser of its own). So FitNesse will run your normal tests, e.g. your SQL script and no browser will be involved. When you're happy with your test, it's easy to just import the FitNesse.fit file into your regular test script and run the test with your normal test execution tool or Jenkins. An example of using FitNesse: Use the TestInitialize() method to kickstart the test case. Define a few variables needed for your script. Place a Label, e.g. Labelled "Log In", on your test page. Define a test for the page. Click the "Log In" label. In the FitNesse.fit file, you can see where the test
