An exploratory study to assess the possible application of digital music at a poorly characterized, underserved, migrant population. To determine whether customized lyric and tone cues, in addition to standardized exercise instructions, produce greater (health) benefits than standard music-based exercise instruction in underserved populations. Quasi-experimental design that compares a "study sample" and a "traditional" referral sample. Participants with health problems not related to cardiovascular disease or flexibility were recruited from a community medical clinic and a public community wellness center. Thirty-eight participants from the community medical clinic and 34 from the community wellness center were assigned to either (1) the study sample (N = 61) or (2) the traditional referral sample (N = 62). Usual care included standard clinic-based instruction. The study sample received instruction using customized lyrics and tone cues, in addition to standardized exercise instructions. The traditional referral sample received only standard clinic-based exercise instructions. Clinical measures of health outcomes (e.g., resting heart rate [HR], blood pressure, peak oxygen consumption, perceived quality of life) were assessed at baseline, postintervention (3 months), and follow-up (6 months). Mixed-effects regression modeling was used to determine whether benefits from the intervention were moderated by sex, race/ethnicity, age, and income. Effect sizes were estimated using Hedges's  $g$ . The main effects of the intervention on clinical outcomes were not significant. Effect sizes ( $g_{1.2}$ - $g_{1.6}$ ) were nonsignificant for the study sample, and small for the traditional referral sample. A significant interaction effect was detected for peak HR ( $g$

= 0.37), indicating that the intervention was more effective for female ( $g = 0.40$ ) than for male ( $g = 0.27$ ) participants and for participants with ( $g = 0.47$ ) than without ( $g = 0.30$ ) a home income of less than $30,000. This study suggests that music combined with standardized instructions produces greater benefit in some female and low-income underserved populations than music alone. The present invention relates to a color image forming apparatus and a color image forming method for forming a color image by superposing and transferring toner images of different colors formed on an image bearing member.
