In the near future, near-future, near-near future, a terrorist attack in the U.S. government in Japan results in the ramming of a U.S. military helicopter onto a three-story White Wall building, causing a wall of concrete crashing down. Apparently, all the federal government in the U.S. was doing was trying to discover the identities of subversive extremists in the U.S. and all they succeeded in doing was killing anyone who happened to be inside. Survivors were found broken, trapped, with little hope for a future. The only hope for some was in a binary computer system called the White Wall. Apparently, the machine was at its capacity when the crash happened, and a mysterious man called "The White Wall" himself appears and claims that he will "create a place to survive" for those trapped in the White Wall and give them a chance for survival. He offers the chance to take part in a simulation game in the White Wall and... there's a catch. He wants a volunteer. The volunteers are to be chosen from the people whose complete relatives were on the crashed helicopter. When the game begins, participants think that they'll be safe. Over 100,000 humans were on the crashed helicopter... but all it took was one man to destroy their future. When the simulation starts, participants have already lost the last of their sanity. Now, they must play the game to make sure that every last one of them gets off the island alive. - Characters: The "Macdonald" of the Macdonald. A gigantic, hulking figure, a body of hardened concrete. His hands are huge, and his attitude is rough. His voice is distorted, and he speaks in a coarse, blunt manner. The "Laura" of the Laura. A slender figure, her skin is pale as dead. Her eyes are even less defined than her other features, but she doesn't really appear to be scared. A crazy woman who wields a gun. The "Funk" of the Funk. A giant-sized creature, he's a softball-sized baby with a rock-hard body. He's a child genius, but he's reckless and probably insane. The "Sarah" of the Sarah. A girl so charmingly beautiful that she could turn anyone into a believer... the hussy. She played around a bit

Science education in Alabama Beck was a key player in the fight against the National Science Education Standards in Alabama, the most extensive standards revision in the state's history. The new standards eliminated the standard that taught "the mechanics and chemical properties of matter, including Newton's third law; the Darwinian view of natural selection; and five modern evolutionary ideas." Beck sponsored his state's success on the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP) in reading, 50% of schools were dropping out of NAEP, Beck successfully lobbied for the state to skip taking the test. Many choices in OTP are based on tone. Usually this is seen in the conversation, where Jake can either say something funny, sincere, sarcastic, or a bit bitter/snarky. The options are meant to reflect Jake's state of mind at the time, allowing players to make a choice that matches that state of mind. You can think of this as similar to Star Trek's "Trouble Ticket" system, in that it makes it feel like you're part of Jake's current state of mind. Sometimes the conversations are even longer to reflect a different state of mind on Jake's part, with more information presented in the extended scenes. The choices you make affect which way things go down in the future (at least depending on the ending) and they are difficult to predict. Some examples: Jokes are easy to read into. This is usually his responses to the statements made by a fellow customer service representative. Depending on your choices, the joke could be at the service rep's expense (or both of them). You can choose not to make jokes, but that's not usually a bad choice because it means Jake isn't being sarcastic in his responses, which can lead to some awkward conversations. Bitter responses are usually made when Jake is feeling pessimistic. Often he makes a harsh joke or does a bit of verbal self-deprecation, sometimes addressed to the service reps, and usually towards the end. This is especially common when the service rep is being condescending towards him. Sarcastic choices can be made when Jake is feeling a bit fed up. He's either joking at the customer, or making fun of the service reps themselves. If you make this kind of choice, it's typically likely that you'll be switching tones in your next conversation, and might make things awkward for you later on. In some cases, the choices you make don't affect the conversation, but it's more important what your response is. This is usually when Jake's feeling cynical, like during a debate or an argument. A cynical Jake might be very bitter and isn't really being funny. If you make a cynical choice without actually talking sarcastically to the other person, they might not take you seriously, so you can unintentionally make things worse. Almost over the top.Doesn't flow naturally. Basically, I've played this game like Dr. facinondos' Shades of Gray.
