License: Freeware. Let me share a couple of my favorite uses of various art tools. To me, what makes something really good is how it "reveals" something to you. That is, what is being created often forces me to see something that I just wouldn't have seen if I hadn't been forced to look. Many of my finished artworks are exploring similar feelings and ideas. Not to be confused with slapdash design, and not every piece is meant to be pretty, some are just meant to be fun and interesting. A negative - the most often used - is the obvious: no photographs, no drawings, no objects, no text. There's just going to be blank white space, so I don't do that. A negative is something you can't get away with. If you've seen a film and something is jarring, it's because that object wasn't in the film originally. It's something that has to be added. It's something you can't get away with, so if it's being added to a painting, I'll make sure that I'm not going to be adding anything that will change the painting. Anything that will be jarring or damaging. The positive that I didn't mention was that I don't necessarily like to use photographs in finished paintings. It's about the music of the image. If it's something that I like, I would like to see that in a more pure form. Shout Out Hi, I'm Alex! I'm a professional artist who's been painting now for over two years. My comic book covers (Abathur, the Demon Hunter) are now published, along with my drawings for issues of the SCG game company's comic, Art of League of Legends.
