They are totally going to know where they come from and what they will eat... A "tiger cub" is a newborn marten. When I was offered the chance to check them out and feed them for the last two weeks, I was obviously very excited to help out. The zoo is coming up on its 25th anniversary and is stepping up the conservation efforts with their Tigers in the Wild program. They have a very restricted breeding programme that concentrates on pairings that are maximised for fertility. So, it's always a good idea to maintain the maximum reproduction of tigers, even in zoos. Martens are territorial to begin with, so you don't just want one cub running around your premises. These guys have really been well fed and are just looking adorable! The cubs often stay close to their mother for several months. Another special feature of these guys is that they are a nocturnal animal. They are born blind but after about a week they start seeing. The cubs spend the first few months playing inside their mother's den (they call it a "man-cub"). Then they will slowly learn to leave home. Just like with any baby, this is a special bonding time for a couple. You don't need to think too hard on how much to feed them, as this is a domestic tiger. Because of their specificity, they have a specific nutritional need. Before getting into the specifics, let's first discuss tigers in general. Tigers
