All functions work the same, regardless of system. (Certain tasks are easier on some systems than on others, but Photoshop's functions are the same for everyone.) Photoshop is multilingual, being available in English, French, Spanish, German, Italian, Portuguese, and Japanese. However, the true power of Photoshop lies in its tools, and Windows users have Photoshop's best tools for image editing. The Mac version is essentially an exact duplicate of the Windows version, and since the most-used Photoshop tool, the Brush, is unique to the Mac, it is often said that the Mac version lacks a powerful tool. Photoshop, as well as its competition, the Adobe PhotoShop Lightroom, is often called a software package. Although it offers many valuable functions for photographers, it does _not_ provide organizing features for the hardware that is needed to create digital images. You still need a camera and a computer, and Photoshop does not help you organize your photos, print them, or create print-ready images. It's a matter of taste whether you consider those things to be part of the software or part of the hardware. Whatever you call it, Photoshop does more than organize your pictures. ## Choosing between Photoshop and Photoshop Elements For beginners, you have two choices for mastering image editing: Photoshop and the new Photoshop Elements. Both are available on the Macintosh and in the Adobe Creative Suite program, mentioned earlier. Most people use the Creative Suite, paying about $800 for the full package. But Adobe offers a lightweight version of Photoshop called Photoshop Elements that includes just the basic tools. Photoshop Elements' cost is about $250. Though you can do a lot with

Q: How can I make my website usable from different device/browser? I know about responsive web design, but I didn't receive any resource about (so far) web design related for SharePoint. I have a website inside of SharePoint, with much tables and unnecessary code. Users need to navigate many links to see the full web page, and these resources are not very user-friendly because they need to navigate the browser many times. How can I make my website usable from different device/browser? A: By "usable" do you mean all the pages in your site are able to work on all devices? If so than that is not possible. You have to specifically create pages that are able to display on different devices / browsers etc. Responsive design is where you make one design and then create a copy with media queries to display the right content for different screen sizes. Here's a great introduction to the concepts of Responsive design: the forest to some extent, but none of them have the ability to take over other people's powers like the kaiju -- they can amplify our own abilities, but they don't have a sense of self that can be killed. In Godzilla, he can pretty much overwhelm any smaller creature. Godzilla is just a larger version of Megalon and Gamera. And probably Nausicaa -- depending on what you want to call it. Here is the original text from the Japanese version of Godzilla vs King Ghidorah (1973). When the trailer "Godzilla vs. King Ghidorah" for the movie of the same name surfaced online, a bunch of the internet's comic book and anime aficionados got together to reinterpret the "Godzilla vs. King Ghidorah" trailer to give us a glimpse into the world of a hypothetical Adam West-style "Super Friends." Admittedly, I didn't have too many of these when they were going around, so I've decided to grab one that I made that's still in the style of the early '80s ("super powers" and all). If you haven't seen this, do yourself a favor and get to it. The animation is pretty fun (it's coming from a fan, so I don't know that it's all that great, but I think it's pretty decent) and the script's not too terrible. I love how the "

, for it means that not only does the government insist that young people do academic research of value, but it also suggests that young people shouldn't just get credit and award money for research they complete through private corporations, but instead they should do research at universities funded by the taxpayer. And here is what they are teaching: "When Bill Clinton was preparing to leave office, he cut funding for the National Endowment for the Humanities by 30 percent. The resulting shortfall forced the humanities to make some of the hardest budget cuts in their history. Science, math, and engineering programs have not been hurt by this cut, but the humanities were hammered. But the NEH has managed to survive, all by itself. And in the years since, the NEH has become a repository of many traditional values. In the NEH's Center for the Book, there is a high-profile board of directors led by Barbara Goldsmith. One of the NEH's governing boards has a Jewish member and an African-American member. Women, African-Americans, and Hispanics hold powerful leadership positions at the NEH. And the NEH has come to include faculty who know that the way to address the most deeply entrenched challenges of gender, race, and class is not by calling for new government programs but by challenging traditional structural biases in education. The NEH has always been a progressive. And in these trying times, it has worked to stress the value of education over and above political party. The NEH's director of public programs, Virginia Martin, recently said that the NEH is "a nonpartisan organization" that "collects research for all who want to access it." Its website says that "teachers, students and families who come here are not defined by an interest in a particular area or perspective."" So, the NEH is re-defining itself for a public that is not young and very free thinking. It's reaffirming its own liberal foundations and its commitment to what the world needs today. According to a study by the NEH, the humanities and the arts produce "a more robust civic culture" and "enhance the quality of life" of every society in the world. It seems to me that this is a mission worthy of the the U.S. government. Perhaps if the NEH were funded by the government, it would be more about
